Characteristics of molecularly cloned organobromine compounds from toxicological studies with rats and mice. Organobromines are a large group of organic halogens, which are well known for their carcinogenic, teratogenic, and endocrine-disrupting properties. Exposure to the compounds induces cellular damage via several mechanisms, including mutations, DNA adducts, and DNA strand breaks. Brominated compounds are characterized by a very high level of structural diversity, which is largely due to the formation of different bromine substituents on different positions of the benzene ring. Although it is well established that these compounds are involved in human disease, a large body of evidence indicates that they also pose a significant risk to the environment. Thus, regulations have been developed in various countries to restrict the use of these compounds as commercial products and to protect the environment from their dispersion and release. However, the detection of organobromine compounds in the environment is limited by their high structural diversity and by the lack of suitable methods. A molecular cloning approach could represent a strategy for the detection and identification of brominated compounds. Using this technique, the characterization of brominated compounds may be achieved by identifying homologous brominated chemical motifs from databases of natural products.

The piperidine alkaloids are a class of compounds having a basic ring structure containing a piperidine moiety. The piperidine ring contains an additional carbon atom, thus forming a cyclic compound. A subclass of the piperidine alkaloids are the tetrahydroisoquinoline alkaloids. The piperidine and tetrahydroisoquinoline alkaloids occur naturally and may be used as starting materials for the synthesis of a large number of other compounds with useful therapeutic properties. The compounds are, in general, easily obtained from corresponding starting materials and are suitable for synthetic preparation or are naturally occurring and can be isolated from various sources. It is known that the piperidine and tetrahydroisoquinoline alkaloids have biological properties. Their toxicity has been reported as associated with specific substituent groups. However, these substituents are necessary for the production of compounds having useful therapeutic properties. Thus, it is often difficult
