, Shade and Lighting! Welcome to Mosaics Fantasy II! After designing and fully cross-referencing the rules, the next phase is in my hands: Play Testing! I'm bringing you 8+ hours of game-test play, in which our two-person team puts the rules through their paces, and adjusts things to make the game better... for everybody! This will follow an informal process that I use to document at length, and I suspect it will be fairly fluid. For example, we will conduct multiple "tests" of the rulebook, but the goal is to better understand what works and why; there will be play conventions which we'll follow. We're not going to talk too much about how our game experiences multiple "test sessions." I will write more about this with games on the table. It's February 2019, so I'm working on our first Play Table! Rules Part 1: Numbers Part 2: Characters Part 3: Combat For now, I'll note that the gameplay is largely consistent with the fantasy mosaic game by Edward James. Edward's game has more complex mechanics, uses a Conflict matrix (1D6-1 to 4), and requires a tighter simulation of characters in their kinds (classes/races). The game Play Test, below, was conducted on Fool's Errand. Our first time playing with this system! Fools Errand is a card-based war game in the vein of Risk and Ascension: Myth and Fragment. In this version of Fool's Errand, you must survive and claim your territory from the forces of rival castes and groups. You are accompanied by the people of your tribe, who can be hired at various times. I am Michael. Our other player was Billy, who is a friend of the family. Intro & Rules Sketch - Michael 2 Hours to Game Good Times Fools Errand is a single-player war game inspired by the board game Risk. Fools Errand uses a setting-neutral conflict chart of oppositions and factions, with the social hierarchy of the setting. Regardless of faction, your goal is survive and expand your territory. Components: 40 cards, each with five factions. 1-2 Deploying tokens (carcasses) representing your character
